History

The Eastern Townships were first settled by the Abenaki people, who lived in the region for centuries before the arrival of Europeans. In the 17th century, French settlers began to arrive in the region, and they established a number of permanent settlements. After the British conquest of Canada in 1763, the Eastern Townships became part of the British colony of Quebec.

The Eastern Townships played an important role in the American Revolutionary War. In 1775, a group of American soldiers led by Benedict Arnold invaded the region and captured the town of Saint-Jean-sur-Richelieu. The Americans were eventually defeated, but the invasion had a lasting impact on the region. Many Loyalists, who remained loyal to the British Crown, fled to the Eastern Townships after the war.
