Crooker, a physician by profession, was drawn to the allure of the island's purported riches in the mid-19th century, becoming an ardent advocate and tireless explorer in the pursuit of its elusive treasure.

The Money Pit: A Labyrinth of Mystery

Crooker's unwavering quest centered around the enigmatic Money Pit, a mysterious excavation located on the island's eastern shore. According to legend, the Money Pit was the site where Captain Kidd, the infamous pirate, concealed an immense treasure trove of gold and jewels. Guided by cryptic clues and tantalizing rumors, Crooker embarked on an audacious endeavor to unravel the pit's secrets and claim its fabled wealth.

In 1849, Crooker joined forces with a group of like-minded individuals to form the Truro Company, an organization dedicated to excavating the Money Pit and retrieving its hidden treasures. Inscribed stones bearing cryptic symbols, mysterious wooden platforms, and even a rumored lead box containing ancient parchment hinted at the presence of a vast and well-concealed treasure.

The discovery of the so-called "Nolan's Cross" in 1857 proved to be a particularly significant moment in Crooker's quest. This enigmatic artifact, a stone cross bearing an inscription alluding to buried treasure, seemed to confirm the existence of a substantial cache of gold hidden somewhere on Oak Island.
